Researchers discover new species of wolf spider in Poland

New species of wolf spider

Researchers studying the impacts of forest clearing on spiders Only a few of the 23 spider species of the genus Lucus has been found in Europe so far A new species of wolf spider has been discovered in Poland and named after its geographical home: Lucus infuscatus. The new species is only the second in Europe of the genus Lucus, which has 23 wolf spider species in total. The large species lives only in trees and the interiors of old buildings. The species, Lucus infuscatus was discovered in 2016 by Eörs Szathmári of the University of Edinburgh in Poland during a study of the effects of forest clearance on spiders. The spider was found living in an old building in the city of Kraków, while the city's main theater was being refurbished. Scientists found the spider building a web in the air ducts of a theater and facing away from the main entrance, which would have helped to keep predators out. The University of Edinburgh researchers went on to assess its body coloration to determine if it was a different species. Since the body of the spider is more variable than the markings on the cephalothorax (top half of the body), they were able to identify the spider as a different species. The researchers have not studied the population numbers of Lucus infuscatus in the Kraków area and do not know if they are part of a huge population or if they are not found at all. Lucus infuscatus is one of only three wolf spider species found in Europe with a furrowed, wavy opisthosoma (the rear part of the body that can be seen if the spider is sideways, like shown here). This furrow (as seen in photos) runs from the top of the abdomen down the midline of
